To honor father and mother is a blessing for anyone. For a child, this privilege begins from the toddler stage right through the early teens and beyond adolescence. However, to achieve the proper upbringing for the child, parents must teach the kid how to respect their father and mother. "Train up a child in the way he should go: and when he is old, he will not depart from it" (Proverbs 22:6). For the child to adapt depends upon the character of both parents and the environment in which they live. However, to establish this task must be done with patience by communication in a pleasant way showing love and care during the process. For a child to honor father and mother starts with time. Each kid in the early teens must give parents some of their leisure time to maintain a healthy balance between family and associates.

When a teenager gives quality time to family, it promotes a healthy atmosphere for both parties. This action may open doors for any kid to receive back in many different ways from them. The more teens put this into regular practice, the firmer the bond will be within the family. The benefits may result in less stress, more peace, good communication, family love, and bring other family relatives closer together. The input from the child towards the family determines the outcome of the child from the family.

However, the development of the child is dependent upon the output of both parents during the toddler years. In the eyes of the infant up to the start of school, what they see is what they will believe. Therefore, both the father and mother living activity are accountable within the eyes of a child. Whether good or bad, a kid will remember. Each parent is well aware of the role they have to live throughout their children's life. The only challenge is doing it with keeping in mind that the child is watching them.
